

En e i

Nicole A. Stargell, The University of North Carolina at Pembroke

DESCRIPTION OF ENURESIS

Enuresis is a condition in which a person has involuntary urination. It is most common in children and adolescents, but can also occur in adults. The condition is often caused by a combination of factors, including a genetic predisposition, a urinary tract infection, or a psychological issue. Enuresis can be a source of embarrassment and social isolation for the person affected, and it can also lead to physical complications if left untreated. Treatment options include behavioral therapy, medication, and surgery. The goal of treatment is to help the person gain control over their bladder and prevent further episodes.

